Not illustrated. 1881 Excerpt: . . . are no seawalls or banks but will want repairs sometime or other, while the sea itself continues to ebb and flow, and while there is tempestuous winds to ruffle and discompose it; and then if a gentleman should do his repairs for 6d. per rod, yet it will still be an advantage to have them done for four or threepence per rod; and as we have already said, we believe we can afford to do the whole repairs in the kingdom much easier in proportion in general than any gentleman whatsoever can be reasonably supposed to do his own in particular. THE NATIONAL ASPECT OF INSURING SEA WALLS. The national aspect is again approached in a new shape: we hope persons of the best quality in the kingdom need not be ashamed to appear at the head of our Society, seeing the greatest monarchs that have warmed the English or British Throne in the ages now elapsed, have gloried in their defending the antient bounds of the Realm against the incursions and assaults of Foreign Enemies, even though they made no new conquests. Whereas we propose not only to secure and defend the present limits of the Kingdom from the incursions of the Sea, but also to enlarge and extend those by new conquests. By the first a great many families will be preserved from calamity and ruin; and by the last both the manufacturers and inhabitants of the nation will be increased. From this there...
