It was while he was bewildered by the contents of this letter, that the three men-of-war from Charleston, sent by South-Carolina to the relief of Georgia, actually made their appearance. They determined the conduct of the Spaniards. They produced the panic among their troops, which resulted in the abandonment of the invasion almost at the beginning. The relation of cause and effect, is as clearly established in this case as in any instance that was ever recorded in history. The Spaniards at once hurried to their ships, leaving their cannon and munitions behind them. Thus, says our historian, the vigilance of Oglethorpe, the skilfulness of his plans, the activity of his operations, the determined spirit of resistance, the carnage of Bloodymarsh, where the young Lieutenants laid the successful ambush, the havoc done to the enemy's ships, and...
