In the absence of a statutory provision the rule of law would seem to be that a superior officer has no power to suspend a subordinate 1 and that the salary of a subordinate who is illegally suspended continues to accrue in spite of such suspension.2 The decisions are, however, by no means in harmony on this point and the consideration of the decisions at common law in the different states is only of academic interest since statutes generally confer upon the chief executive officer of the police force the power to suspend policemen pending their trial upon charges. This suspension is not a punishment but merely a measure taken to safeguard the public interests. Thus a policeman who habitually indulges in alcoholic beverages to excess might do very great injury to the public, if his police 1 Gregory...
