Excerpt: . . . acts of his comedy, and delighted us with his work. No cleverer dialogue had we heard for many a day, while the characters were admirably adapted, it seemed to us, to their proposed exponents. This helped much to cheer our departure for the Engadine; since the extraordinary success of School, the result of which entirely passed all the hopes I had formed of the theatres possibilities, justified our resuming the run of it, when we began work again in November. The season closed brilliantly. Never was the saying A bad beginning makes a good ending more amply verified. I have told how, on the opening night, some occupants of the second circle were discontented and riotous; let my postscript on the last night be that they cheered us again and again with cries of Come back soon! On the following evening, Mrs. Bancroft had the pleasure of reading Major Namby at the Lyceum Theatre at the close of Henry Irvings season, and the next morning we started for Pontresina, having the welcome companionship, as a fellow-traveller, of a dear and affectionate friend in J. C. Parkinson, which made our journey memorably happy. Again we had a hearty welcome to the little village, which was this year for the first time honoured by a visit from the Prince and Princess Christian, who were accompanied by the two young princes. Mrs. Bancroft had the opportunity of nursing the young Prince Christian during a throat affection, which earned...
